The wife, baby in arms, waited the streets day and night in the hope of finding him. During the sizzling heat of July and Augustahe paced the dooks, thinking the body micht come up. She found in some way food for herself and child. Milk dealers, baker boys and fruit sellers got to know her and they were kind to her.

Her Winter experience, however, passes human understanding. Somebody settled with the house agent, and ase had shelter, but nothing else—aosolutely nothing. When the weather was blood-freezing the neighbors took turns in asking her to sit by their fires. It was also arranged that she should have the "leavings," crumbs and crusts of bread and the dregs of the coffee cups and soup dishes. She had a spool, which she used as a knocker and which all the tenanta recognized. When the knock was not answered it was understood that the occupants had "bad luck, but come another day."

Her child always accompanied her, and together they were nourished on such scraps as pity had to offer. It is doubtful if the woman has had one good warm meel since last May, bomebody gave her $3 for Christmas. It was 87 STORM SKIRT.

Merchants are mindful of the growing aversion to needles and thimbles. Hence the alliance of the suitmaker, shirt-maker and tailor for the purpose of supplying cheap ready-made skirts, shirts and fackets.

The popularity of the suspender suit last Summer was encouraging. Some firms sold a cutaway, two-button coat, and a plain skirt of navy blue serge for it. There was a cotton facing on the and a plain skirt of navy blue serge for fill. There was a cotton facing on the skirt, and the coat was finished at the seams with cheap satin, but this was the only approach to a lining.

The idea now is to supply the trade with the new style skirt, six yards wide at the hem, made by machine, but well made, prettily trimmed with narrow braid, faced, lined and stiffened, provided with a sik-faced pocket and a pantaloon pocket, and finished with a yoke or girdle belt to fasten out spiral wire trimmings both were the walst.
